

Life flows quietly in Donegal. A small village on the banks of the Atlantic that lives on fishing and tourism, surrounded by green valleys and fields of clover. The inhabitants, after a busy day of work, love to crowd the pubs of the village to drink a good beer.

You've decided to drop everything. Tired of your job, you move to Ireland, attracted by the ease of doing business. You've always had a passion for beer. Why not set up a small craft brewery? You decide to apply for funding, which is granted.

Those days you were in Donegal. Just a weekend trip. Loitering around the village, you find an abandoned shed on the outskirts for sale for the symbolic price of one euro. The measurements are perfect. Not even three months later, the first barrel of beer comes out of the factory.

You've been living in Donegal for forty years. And with you, your wife, your children and your grandchildren. And it was supposed to be two days. Life flows quietly in Donegal, among green valleys and fields of clovers.

In Donegal, players impersonate producers running a small brewery. Their goal is to sell their production to the village pubs.
